ABOUT A BORING MOLLUSK.

Self-Imprisoned Sea Creature Becomes Accustomed to Summons at Feedluk Time.

Down at the bottom of a balanced aquarium tank, a cylindrical glass jar Chas. A. Davidson, clerk of the 16 inches deep by a foot in diameter, in the heart of a bunch of brain coral about the shape of and four times as big as a Judge Gill returned yesterday doorkoob, at the New York aquarium, from Cleveland, Ohio, and other lives a self-imprisoned creature whose presence there was unsuspected for a year, says the Sun.

When this plece of coral, which was representative today that the visit brought up from Bermuda something more than a year ago, was placed on the bottom of the tank, there was observer in it, a little to one side from the top, an oval-shaped opening about threesighths of an inch one way by a quarter of an Inch the other, with a little spear of some marine vegetation that looked like the bleached-out tip of a As to the investigation of officials | tiny blade of grass projecting across one end of the opening underneath. That was all there was to it, so far as appearances went-a little hole in the top of the coral, with a little scrap of sea grass across the under side of it.

After the coral was placed in the tank it remained without sign of life for a year. Then one day a few weeks ago, at feeding time, when the food was carried down through the water on the end of a alender rod, something within the opening brushed aside that spear of grass from across the under side and fairly filled up the little opening with itself, this something being the end of a boring mollusk, which had been living in there all this time without anybody's knowing it, and which had now for the first time come into view.

It had been getting what it could or what chanced to come to it for food, but at last, apparently, it had come to the door of its self-made cell to get for itself some share of the food supplied to

And now whenever the edge of its cell door is tapped gently with the tip of the feed stick this boring mollunk comes forward from within, and, thrusting aside that spear of grass, which always falls back across the opening when the moliusk retires from it, fills up the doorway as it did on its first appearance. It might now be described as a tame mol-

There are many kinds of boring mollusks, one example being the teredo, commonly called the shipworm, which bores in wood. There are many stone borers. The soft sandstone rock that is fished up from the ocean bottom off the Jersey coast is honeycombed with the borings of such animals, which, free swimmers in their earliest stage, when they are very small, attach themselves to the rock and bore into it, making a small hole through which they get in, and horing out a bigger place after they get inside, as they continue to grow. Inside their stone cell they are safe from other marine animals which would prey upon them outside, and they get their own food through the opening.

and bore through the rock, when the tides might wash them out; or they might so honeycomb a mass of rock that it would fall and involve thousands in a common destruction.

But there are boring mollusks which one up from Bermuda, now perhaps an inch in length, which has bored into, and, as it grew, bored out a home for itself in the heart of a plece of hard brain coral, and which comes now to the door ley View, Ky., "my feet were swollen of its cell when you tap on the doorjamb
